QUARTERLY REVIEW & OUTLOOK SUMMARY

The virus has undoubtedly disrupted the likelihood of modest gains in the first half of the year, with downward revisions to global growth expected. Nonetheless, we expect continued economic expansion, albeit on a lower trajectory, although the depth and duration of this market shock is still uncertain.

We believe that while the coronavirus has led to a short-term shakeout of markets, this is a welcome reset to the system, affording investors a chance to add another one or two years of steady gains as the global economy recovers from this shock. On a longer-term view, we believe these events have set the scene for a strong rebound – we cannot discount the fact that global stocks could well reach new all-time highs once again.

We will remain invested as we believe the rebound will be sharp, however we will maintain higher than average cash levels to quickly and efficiently redeploy capital at the first sign of any form of stabilisation in the global spread of the coronavirus. Opportunities include additions to areas that have been severely impacted by the crash and are now looking more attractive from a relative valuation perspective, such as UK, European and Asian equities, as well as high quality companies in the US market.

We will avoid firing all our ammunition on day one, as we appreciate that the worst of the virus is not behind us. Rather, we will conduct a gradual and controlled recommitment to the market, which we feel is the best way to capture a rebound as and when it comes.
